

To all concerned;

Add my name to the list of NJ residents who like the Do Not Call List exactly as it is. I can understand the reasons businesses have for wanting to be able to contact individuals who have done business with them in the past 18 months. However, there's got to be better, more effective, and less intrusive ways for businesses to reach their past customers. One way that comes to mind right away is for businesses to provide good value for the cost of their products or services, phenomenal customer service, and friendly and helpful staff who show respect for me and my time. Businesses that do that don't need to resort to calling me during dinner to offer me their next "special" offer -- they've earned my business, and I'll reward them by continuing to do business with them as well as recommending them to my friends and family.

Sincerely,
Dina DiRenzo
